The following objects are masked from 'package:stats':

filter, lag
```

The following objects are masked from 'package:base':

intersect, setdiff, setequal, union

```
library(ggplot2) # Optional, for visualization if needed
```

load the Spotify attribute dataset
data <- read.csv("Spotify_Song_Attributes.csv")
Create of a copy of the spotify attribute dataset

1.4 Handling Missing Values :-

Check for missing values in each column
colSums(is.na(spotify_data))
```

```
trackName      artistName      msPlayed      genre
0           0           0           0
danceability      energy      key      loudness
550           550           550           550
mode      speechiness      acousticness      instrumentalness
550           550           550           550
liveness      valence      tempo      type ##           550           550           550           0
id      uri      track_href      analysis_url
0           0           0           0
duration_ms      time_signature
550           550

We can see:

1. Columns with Zero Missing Values :- Columns like trackName, artistName, msPlayed, genre, id, uri, track_href, analysis_url, and type have no missing values, ensuring they are complete for analysis.
2. Columns with 550 Missing Values :- Columns such as danceability, energy, key, loudness, mode, speechiness, acousticness, instrumentalness, liveness, valence, tempo, duration_ms, and time_signature have significant missing values (550). This indicates a need to address these missing entries to ensure reliable analysis.

1.4.1 Remove Missing Values

Option 1: Remove rows with missing values (if they are few)
spotify_data <- na.omit(spotify_data)
```

1.4.2 Check missing values have been successfully removed or not

Check for missing values in each column after applying na.omit function
colSums(is.na(spotify_data))
```

```
trackName      artistName      msPlayed      genre
0           0           0           0
danceability      energy           key      loudness
0           0           0           0
mode      speechiness      acousticness      instrumentalness
0           0           0           0
liveness      valence           tempo           type ##           0           0           0           0
id           uri      track_href      analysis_url
0           0           0           0
duration_ms      time_signature
0           0

All values being zero in the output confirms that no missing data remains in the dataset. This clean dataset now contains only complete rows, ideal for accurate and consistent analysis.

str(spotify_data)

Just check missing values removed from structure data or not.

1.5 Remove unwanted columns :

Load dplyr library
library(dplyr)

Remove `trackName` along with other unnecessary columns
spotify_data <- spotify_data %>% select(-id, -uri, -track_href, -analysis_url, -trackName, -type)

Statistical Reasoning for Dropping Variables:

With `msPlayed` as the dependent variable, `genre` and `artistName` as categorical predictors, and `danceability`, `energy`, and `acousticness` as continuous predictors, the removed columns (`id`, `uri`, `track_href`, `analysis_url`, `trackName`, and `type`) do not contribute meaningfully :

- Identifiers and URLs (e.g., `id`, `uri`, `track_href`, `analysis_url`): These columns are unique per observation, hence irrelevant for generalizing to other data.
 - `trackName`: The track name does not significantly contribute to the variance in `msPlayed` as it is non-numeric and non-informative for predictive modeling.
 - `type`: This column is constant (e.g., “audio”), offering no variability for analysis.

Check the specified column has been removed or not
str(spotify_data)

We can see the outputs of `print(whitespace_issues)` and `print(special_characters)` list artist names needing cleaning. This step prevents potential duplicates due to unnecessary whitespace or inconsistent special characters, resulting in a cleaner dataset.

1.6.2 Identifying Duplicated Artist Names

Identify duplicated artist names after cleaning
duplicate_artists <- spotify_data$artistName[duplicated(spotify_data$artistName)]

Display duplicate entries
print(duplicate_artists)
```

Listing unique artist names helps verify that previous cleaning steps have standardized names and reduced redundancy. This step ensures each artist is represented consistently.

1.6.4 Replace Special Characters

Replace special characters like $ with s (only if necessary)
spotify_data$artistName <- gsub("\$", "s", spotify_data$artistName)

`gsub()` replaces the dollar sign ($) with s in `artistName`, ensuring that names are consistent. Special characters can lead to additional, unnecessary levels in a categorical variable, so standardization is essential for accurate analysis.

1.6.5 Convert Artist Names to Lowercase

Convert artistName to lowercase spotify_data$artistName <- tolower(spotify_data$artistName)
```

This step converts all `artistName` entries to lowercase, ensuring that variations in capitalization do not result in duplicate levels within the categorical data.

1.6.6 Removing Identical Rows

Load dplyr package
library(dplyr)

Removing rows that are identical across all columns
spotify_data <- distinct(spotify_data)

`distinct()` from the `dplyr` package removes rows that are entirely identical across all columns. This is especially useful in datasets where repeated entries do not add value and can skew results.

1.6.7 Group Rare Artists

Group artists with fewer than the threshold of entries into "Other"
threshold <- 5
artist_counts <- table(spotify_data$artistName) rare_artists <- names(artist_counts[artist_counts < threshold]) spotify_data$artistName <- ifelse(spotify_data$artistName %in% rare_artists, "Other", spotify_data$artistName)
```

This code groups artists with fewer than five occurrences as “Other,” reducing the levels of `artistName`. This step improves model interpretability by focusing on more common categories, reducing noise from rarely observed artist names.

1.6.8 Convert Artist Names to Factor

Convert artistName to a factor
spotify_data$artistName <- as.factor(spotify_data$artistName)
```

Sample check for lowercase conversion
head(spotify_data$artistName, 10) # View the first 10 values
```

Converting artistName to a factor makes it a categorical variable, which is required for certain types of analyses, such as regression models with categorical predictors. Factors allow for easier interpretation and analysis of categorical data.

Comprehensive check to identify any uppercase letters
any(grepl("[A-Z]", spotify_data$artistName))

[1] TRUE
```

This code checks the lowercase conversion by displaying a sample of the first 10 artist names. This quick visual inspection ensures that previously applied lowercase transformations are working as expected.

Ensure all artist names are in lowercase
spotify_data$artistName <- tolower(spotify_data$artistName)

Re-run the check
any(grepl("[A-Z]", spotify_data$artistName))
```

Output Interpretation :- The sample output shows Other for less common artists grouped under the “Other” category. Confirming lowercase letters in this output helps verify consistent naming.

[1] FALSE
```

This code uses grepl() to identify any remaining uppercase letters. A TRUE output would indicate the presence of uppercase letters, suggesting that further cleaning is needed.

Check for missing values in the dataset
sum(is.na(spotify_data))

Output Interpretation: Initially, if the output is TRUE, it shows that not all names were converted to lowercase. After running `tolower()` again, `any(grepl("[A-Z]", spotify_data$artistName))` should output FALSE, confirming that all names are now lowercase.

[1] 0
```

This section ensures that all artist names are indeed lowercase by running `tolower()` again and re-checking for uppercase letters. This final check confirms that `artistName` is consistently formatted.

View the frequency distribution of artist names
table(spotify_data$artistName)

Output Interpretation: The expected output FALSE confirms that all uppercase letters are now converted, ensuring standardization.

The `table()` function shows the frequency distribution of each `artistName`, allowing inspection of common and rare artist occurrences. This distribution is useful for verifying the effectiveness of grouping rare artists into “Other.”

Converting artistName to a factor variable is essential for using it as a categorical predictor in models. The str() function displays the internal structure of artistName, confirming its categorical nature.

Output Interpretation: The output shows that artistName is now a factor with 169 levels, confirming that rare artists have been grouped effectively, and the column is ready for use as a categorical predictor.

This lists all levels (unique artist names and “Other”) in artistName, ensuring clarity and consistency. This step verifies that levels are correctly defined, which is critical for accurate modeling of categorical data.

Count missing values
```

```
sum(is.na(spotify_data$genre) | spotify_data$genre == "")

[1] 475
```

This counts entries in genre that are either missing (NA) or empty (“”). Identifying such values helps determine how many genres need to be filled or standardized.

spotify_data$genre[spotify_data$genre == ""] <- "unknown"
```

Output Interpretation: The output shows the count of missing or empty values (e.g., 475), guiding the decision to replace these with a placeholder or remove them if needed.

spotify_data$genre <- tolower(spotify_data$genre)
```

genre_counts <- sort(table(spotify_data$genre), decreasing = TRUE) print(genre_counts)

Replacing empty genre values with “unknown” prevents them from being mistaken for missing values, providing a clear placeholder. Converting all genre names to lowercase ensures consistency, especially if genre is used as a categorical variable.

Converting “unknown” and empty genres back to NA clarifies that these entries are missing genre data, which could be handled accordingly in the analysis (e.g., by imputing or omitting).

The `genre_mapping` dictionary maps specific genre variations to broader categories (e.g., mapping “alt z” to “alternative” or “bedroom r&b” to “r&b”). The `recode()` function uses this mapping to transform genre values, reducing the number of unique genres and standardizing categories for improved interpretability.

spotify_data$genre <- recode(spotify_data$genre, !!!genre_mapping)
```

Output Interpretation: After applying `recode()`, the unique genres in `spotify_data$genre` are consolidated, making it easier to analyze broader genre categories and ensuring that similar genres are grouped effectively.

unique(spotify_data$genre)

It uses the `recode` function to standardize genre names in `spotify_data$genre` based on a pre-defined dictionary, `genre_mapping`. This dictionary maps specific genre variations to broader, consistent categories (e.g., “alt z” to “alternative”). The `!!!` operator expands all key-value pairs in `genre_mapping` as arguments within `recode`, allowing for multiple replacements in a single line. This approach is efficient, readable, and easily modifiable, ensuring that similar genres are consolidated consistently under unified labels. This standardization simplifies analysis and improves interpretability, with a cleaner set of genre categories ready for modeling and reporting.

The `case_when()` function standardizes genre names, mapping specific variations (e.g., “alt z” to “alternative”) to broader categories. This consolidation reduces the complexity of genres, making analysis more interpretable by grouping similar genres together.

Convert to lowercase and replace NA values with "other" using base R
spotify_data$genre <- tolower(spotify_data$genre)           # Convert everything to lowercase spotify_data$genre[is.na(spotify_data$genre)] <- "other"     # Replace NA values with "other"

Capitalize the first letter of each word for uniformity (optional)
spotify_data$genre <- tools::toTitleCase(spotify_data$genre)

Verify the final list of unique genres unique_genres <- unique(spotify_data$genre)
print(unique_genres)

Genres with fewer than 5 entries are grouped into “Other.” This threshold reduces the number of unique categories, making it easier to interpret results by focusing on more common genres and reducing noise from rare categories.

- Lowercasing ensures uniformity in genre values, preventing case-sensitive duplicates. Converting NA values to “other” provides a clear placeholder for missing genres, maintaining consistency across all entries.

- Capitalizing each genre’s first letter enhances readability, especially in visualizations and reports. This step is optional and purely for presentation.

Check unique values in artistName
unique(spotify_data$artistName)
```

- Checking unique genres confirms that all values are standardized and consistent, with similar genres grouped effectively.

Convert genre to a factor
spotify_data$genre <- as.factor(spotify_data$genre)

Verify the conversion
str(spotify_data$genre)
```

```
Factor w/ 98 levels "Aggressive Phonk",...: 78 34 55 78 88 3 78 57 47 57 ...

Converting genre to a factor prepares it for categorical analysis, making it easier to use in modeling and statistical tests. Factors improve efficiency in R and help avoid unintended behavior in models that expect categorical predictors.

Output Interpretation: The `str(spotify_data$genre)` output shows genre as a factor with unique levels, verifying successful conversion and readiness for use in categorical analysis.

Save the modified dataframe to a new CSV file
write.csv(spotify_data, "modified_spotify_data.csv", row.names = FALSE)
```

Finally done with both categorical variables. So, I have saved this file in my directory :-
